Merger or no merger, Sprint presses ahead with KC network buildout

By Elise Reuter Reporter, Kansas City Business Journal

May 30, 2018, 3:46pm

Even with plans to merge with T-Mobile US Inc., Sprint Corp will continue full-steam ahead with plans to build out its network in Kansas City, executives said.

Scott Santi, Sprint's vice president of network deployment, said the carrier would be on track to finish its two-year network upgrade in Kansas City by the spring of 2019, which will make Sprint's tri-band spectrum available at all of its area towers.

In addition to tower upgrades, Overland Park-based Sprint's (NYSE: S) plans include building out more small cells, or 40-pound devices that provide coverage in a small radius.

This time next year we will have even better improvements to our network, Santi told the Kansas City Business Journal. We have quite a few small cells under deployment in and around Kansas City and have quite a few more planned.

Big interest in small cells

Rick Usher, assistant city manager for Kansas City, said staff had seen an uptick in applications for small cells from multiple providers in the past two years.

We have seen an increase in interest. It's moving across the country with the huge increases in wireless device usage and deployment, Usher said.

To date, he said, the Public Works Department had entered agreements with about seven small cell providers. City policies dictate that the devices should be installed on existing infrastructure, such as streetlights, when possible, and freestanding poles are subject to feedback from nearby property owners.

We don't want pole clutter in the public right-of-way, Usher said.

At the national level, deregulation by the Federal Communications Commission will exempt small cell deployments from having to file for National Environmental Policy Act and National Historical Preservation Act review for permitting. It also would exempt carriers from the tribal review process, which ensures that projects would not affect tribal historic properties, regardless of who owns the land.

Sprint said tribal review fees cost it an average of $8,251, about a quarter of the $35,000 cost of the average small cell deployment. Those changes will take effect in July.

5G preparations

Usher added that he had seen more providers move from focusing on building small cells in busy areas to taking more of a citywide approach. He also has begun seeing requests for 5G-capable small cells, though the first compatible smartphones aren't expected to come out until 2019.

Santi said Sprint had begun developing a plan to deploy 5G small cells as well. Sprint Executive Chairman Marcelo Claure previously said the company's next-generation network would be built on the deployment of 40,000 small cells, as well as a new antenna technology called Massive MIMO on its towers, which will be able to support both 4G LTE and 5G.

Santi didn't say what percentage of towers in Kansas City would have Massive MIMO to start, but the city recently was announced as one of the first nine metros where Sprint will roll out its 5G network early next year.

Eventually, the idea would be to have everything in the entire market, Santi said. Right now we're just trialing a cluster of sites in the Kansas City market and other markets as well to get it rolled out in an efficient format.

Sprint's 5G deployment could be a useful tool for future iterations of the Smart City initiative. Currently, all of the sensors and smart streetlights in the downtown corridor talk to one another using Sprint's WiFi network. But if the Smart City effort were to expand citywide, more infrastructure would be needed.

Although Kansas City hasn't announced any partnerships yet, Sprint and T-Mobile both have expressed interest in this work, Santi added.

If we went citywide, we would need small cells, Santi said. You need a network that's going to serve the entire geography of the city. It's much easier to partner on these things.
